Mappy Ending of "Letty," a New Drama, Caused It to Be Well Received in Spite of One Scene Not Liked.

LONDON, Oct. 9.-Arthur Pinero's new play "Letty," presented in the Duke of York's Theatre last night by Charles Prohesio, is a drama of prission, which morally if not altogether happily. Letty is a delicate, high-strung, case cloving girl clerk, who falls in we with and is loved by Letchmere, a eithy admirer. When she anticipates marriage proposal from him and he closes that he is married she is torn conditions, but ultimately see to sollow his advice and accept the porable advances of her boorish, vulgar employer. She revolts at the latter's rutal conduct at dinner in the Cafe Regence, which is witnessed by Letchmere, who persuades her to go to his where a scene of intense passion is enacted, Letty being ultimately saved seeing Letchmere half maddened ith sorrow and despair at hearing that

The epilogue, thirty months later, ands Letty married to a photographer, who figured very amiably earlier in the Letch.mere, broken in health, Letty have an extremely touching in-terview in which she thanks him fer-widly for having allowed her to leave coms unharmed that fateful night It is suggested rather than stated that their love still lives, and the curtain falls as she leans wearily against the door through which he has passed out of her life forever.

Irene Vanbrugh played finely in the difficult acting part of Letty.

H. B. Irving was at his best in the smotional sagnes.

Nancy Price made a great hit as the headsome millimer's girl with no troublesome moral principles and a ready flow of worldly wisdom. Diom Bouckgault invested the slight sketchef the photographer with true artistio merit.

The play was enthusiastically received. The ending secures its popularity, which the daring scene in Letohmere's rooms might otherwise jeopardize. The dialogue is brilliant and the characters are marked by Pinero's usual decision and instant. TO BE "GIRLCOTTED"
